I have lived in Louisville nearly my entire life. I obtained my undergraduate degree in Biology at the University of Louisville and attended UofL School of Medicine for my medical degree. During medical school, I enjoyed many of my rotations and it was a fairly long road through surgical internship and a lot of introspection that finally led me back to Family Medicine. I could not be happier to be able to continue my training at a program as wonderful as this one and remain close to family and friends.

I love that family medicine affords the opportunity to provide continuous care to patients in all stages of their life as well as the full spectrum of health and disease. The population in Louisville is very diverse which is critical in developing a broad based foundation in medicine. Also, the fellowships in geriatrics and sports medicine give the opportunity to work with these special populations. Even if I decide not to pursue either of these fellowships, the privilege to work with these specialists and the knowledge I am able to gain from them will be very valuable in my future practice.

Outside of medicine, my main interests involve my family. My husband Todd and I have two beautiful children, Kylie and Zachary. Some of favorite outings are trips to the zoo and walks in the park.
