

Why is Accreditation Important?

“The goal of accreditation is to ensure that education provided by institutions of higher education meets acceptable levels of quality.”

-----U.S Department of Education (<http://ope.ed.gov/accreditation/>)

Accrediting agencies are third---party entities whose purpose is to insure that institutions and programs meet standards for program quality and that they are committed to continuous improvement. To obtain accreditation, the program or institution must demonstrate that it meets the requirements of the accrediting body related to curriculum, program admission and exit requirements, course offerings, program faculty, and facilities and financial resources, among other areas.

Accredited programs and institutions undergo rigorous review before accreditation is granted and are evaluated regularly to insure continued compliance with standards and policies that demonstrate the quality of the institutional or individual programs. Accreditation fosters program accountability to the public and engagement in continuous peer review and improvement.

Having a degree from a program that is nationally accredited not only speaks to the quality of the education, but it can also mean that credits taken are transferable to other accredited programs or institutions and that the degree will be recognized by employers.

The U.S. Department of Education lists those accrediting agencies that are determined to be reliable authorities in measuring the quality of the education and training of a program or institution at List of Nationally Recognized Accrediting Agencies.

The University of Louisville is accredited by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools Commission on Colleges.
